Q: Is it possible for a Windows service to send a message to the same service? I have a Windows service that I'm writing to provide some infrastructure for other services. The service is started on its own, and in addition to being started on its own, it must be able to send a message to itself when it is already started. Is it possible to have a Windows service send a message to itself, or should I be looking to use something other than a Windows service? A: Service cannot send message to itself or to any other services. MSDN Phosphatidylinositol 4-kinases (PI4Ks) convert the head group of phosphatidylinositol (PI) into its 4-phosphorylated derivatives. PI4Ks belong to a superfamily of lipid kinases that exhibit key enzymatic functions in lipid signaling. These lipid kinases catalyze the ATP-dependent phosphorylation of the 4-hydroxyl group of PI (PI4P, PI4,5P2, PI4,5,6P2). The best studied PI4P derivatives are PI4P, PI4,5P2 and PI4,5,6P2. These lipids have well established roles in membrane trafficking, cell signaling, cytoskeletal organization, vesicular transport, and energy metabolism. Studies of PI4Ks have been impeded by the fact that these enzymes are difficult to express recombinantly in functional form in vitro. In fact, PI4Ks are the only enzymes that exhibit sequence similarity with the ADP-ribosyl cyclase, Cdc42
