FXI's successor faces some tough comparisons Hey, Square Enix, yes, we know you're making a new fantasy action RPG featuring Japanese-style characters for the Western audience. We know that for your next game, you had to start over from scratch. So why the heck do you have to do this again? And why will this game have such heavy, direct, and hard comparisons to the Final Fantasy series? I know that FFXVII's story had to be told, and I don't think that the beginning of the series was the best, but look what happened to Final Fantasy VIII. I think you were able to create a new world. I'm not saying that the Final Fantasy series is bad. If you were to look at its run from Final Fantasy IV to VI, then you would say, “Wow, that’s a great run, especially considering all of the great ways they ignored the Final Fantasy III formula.” But then you see Final Fantasy X, and you say, “That game is horrible. I loved Final Fantasy VII. I loved how it told the story, and I loved how the characters grew because of their experiences. Final Fantasy VIII was a good anime film. It should’ve never been a game.” And you start to wonder, why is Final Fantasy X so popular? If it was to create a new world and tell the story in a different way, then why is X the one that’s so popular, and not VIII or VII? And then you see XIII, and you say, “Yeah, I liked Final Fantasy X, but I just wish that game had a greater story, more things to do, and more dramatic elements. I also loved the character creation system. It really helped me create a character that was so special.” So Square Enix, instead of creating a new world with Final Fantasy XV, why not just make a Final Fantasy XV that has Final Fantasy XII levels of great? Instead of creating a new world, why not just tell the story that Final Fantasy XII already told? Instead of creating a new world, why not just make a Final Fantasy XII that had Final Fantasy XIII levels of great? You know what I’m

Separate and joint analyses of skeletal fluorophores for calibrated and uncalibrated images of dental calculus. Human dental calculus, formed by the deposition of calcium and phosphate ions and organic material, is an ubiquitous element in the diet of humans and other animals. Calcium phosphates precipitated from water by phosphate-citric acid complexes give dental calculus great longevity because they remain firmly attached to tooth surfaces. Continuous exposure to and immersion in water over extended periods of time results in apatite precipitation. The apatite formed is markedly different from dental calculus. Different regions of some dental surfaces are involved in growth of apatite growth, creating distinct morphologic deposits known as "fish scales." Because oral bacteria indicate the deposit area, an initial survey of fossil dental calculus provides evidence of the origin area of the stone. To better visualize the presence of fish scales, the current study investigated two forms of dental calculus that are widely used in paleontology, uncalibrated and calibrated. The latter is calcium phosphates that are standardized as optical calibration standards by transmission Raman spectroscopy of known intensity. The calibrated mineral image is useful to distinguish calcifications using and is particularly useful to quantify fish scales where it removes false peaks that are occasionally seen in uncalibrated forms of crystalline calcium phosphates. The calcification process appears to
