For each camera image to be captured, each photodetector has a potential to receive light originating from different portions of a single scintillator. The contributions to the camera image from different portions of a single scintillator are usually time-dependent. For example, a gamma ray emitted by the radioisotope source usually has a spectrum that ranges from several keV to several MeV. Photon emission from the scintillator is mainly a result of energy deposition in the scintillator by gamma rays of approximately 511 keV or electrons of approximately 3 MeV. Such photons in the energy spectrum have different times for reaching the photodetector. In addition, for each scanning interval, a single camera frame may contain photodetector data referring to different scanning intervals from different camera images. When a large fraction of the electron track length is imaged in a single camera frame, the difference in the photodetector timings between an electron track that exits the scintillator surface from one end of the scintillator and an electron track that exits from the opposite end of the scintillator can be substantial. In this case, the photodetector timings from the different camera images may not be aligned. In yet another case, when the scintillator is mounted in a large area camera, the multiple paths of electron tracks may traverse some of the many scintillator crystals at the same time. Photodetector timings for a given electron track may vary depending on the scanning interval at which the photodetector is triggered.
