"I just really want to see that kids will be able to go to school and not have their classmates look at them and think, 'What does that one kid have?'" said Carlos Moya. As a dental technician and co-founder of Moya Technologies, Moya's a seasoned dental professional who has also been a dental technician for 35 years. But he is also a former teacher who sees himself as a role model for kids. "If I can help a kid grow up with a smile and be proud of themselves and that pride, I really want to help them accomplish that," said Moya. And that's why Moya developed "Ridgid", a collapsible dental tray made with a liquid dental resin that allows a patient to practice the proper use of their dentures by grabbing them in the middle and being able to easily refold it back. The concept was developed several years ago, but Moya wanted to get it off the ground by putting it up for competition in San Francisco's Technology Start-Up Challenge, which supports small companies that provide new technology, solutions, and services to the public. "It's relatively simple, but it's also incredible how advanced it is," said San Francisco Chief Technology Officer Chris Sagers. "If the first thing that happens when I need to replace something in my house is, 'Oh, I have to call a contractor or go out to Home Depot and buy a new one,' that blows my day." Created as a national contest, the San Francisco event was a finalist, but did not make the top

Aeronautical engineering company Oerlikon is offering a new solution that will reduce the price of aircraft emissions certification, helping airlines lower their operating costs, says its company chief. "Mankind is facing a large challenge: The continued growth in the global economy, based on increasing populations and per-capita consumption of goods, leads to more air transport worldwide," said Jorg Grass, chairman of the board of Oerlikon, explaining a decision by the manufacturer of gas flowmeters to invest in a new product line for emissions certification. READ MORE: Copter manufacturers ready to join FIT Oerlikon's current emissions certification products are popular within airlines, used to certify commercial aircraft for airport and environment compliance. Oerlikon's new line, however, includes a new gas flowmeter as well as integrated catalytic converters developed in partnership with Linde AG, manufacturer of air conditioning and refrigeration systems for the air transport industry. "We are pleased to be able to make this new solution available to our customers and continue our long and successful tradition in the field of aircraft emissions certification," said Oerlikon's Grass. The new catalytic converters are designed for retrofitting to current airplane engines, such as the Rolls-Royce Trent 900 engine. Catalytic converters help the air onboard an aircraft to remain clear of noxious and corrosive gases, removing potentially toxic emissions. In particular, catalytic converters convert flammable substances, such as aldehydes and formaldehyde, to non-toxic substances. Last summer, Oerlikon won the aircraft market of another well-known manufacturer, the Leonardo Aircraft Group, with a unique catalytic converter designed to suit the company's aircraft engines. "We have been developing catalytic converters for decades, but have never tried to sell them as a complete solution. Companies working in the field, such as Oerlikon, are more focused on optimizing their products, whereas we are also focused on the certification of our products," said Leonardo's MD and group chief executive, Marco Carraro. Carraro added that Leonardo's cooperation with Oerlikon came thanks to the latter's long-standing cooperation with the airline industry. "The cooperation we have with Oerlikon is based on their know-how e79ca774b
